Tale 2: The Great Mango Sharing Festival

Moral: Joy multiplies when we share our blessings with others.

How Little Gaja Found His Big Voice

Deep in the Nilgiri hills of Southern India lived Gaja, a cheerful little elephant with very big ears.

Unlike his big cousins who could trumpet like thunder, Gaja's voice was soft like a morning breeze: 'squeak-toot!'

One sunny afternoon, a baby deer got its hoof stuck between two slippery river rocks.

The rushing waters were rising quickly. Gaja tried to trumpet for the herd, but only a gentle whistle came out.

Taking a deep breath of fresh jungle air and thinking only of his friend, Gaja trumpeted from his very heart: 'BAROOOOM!'

The giant herd heard the call and rushed over immediately, safely lifting the deer to the grassy bank.

The herd elder patted Gaja's head: 'A big voice is good, Gaja, but a brave heart is the greatest gift of all.'

MORAL OF THE STORY:

"True bravery is speaking up to help someone in need."

The Great Mango Sharing Festival

During the golden summer month, the ancient mango tree by the lake was heavy with thousands of sweet, juicy mangoes.

Kalu the monkey wanted to guard the tree all for himself. 'All these mangoes are mine!' he chattered.

Gaja approached gently with a basket made of woven palm leaves. Instead of hoarding, Gaja picked the sweetest fruit and offered it to the forest birds, squirrels, and rabbits.

Seeing the smiles on everyone's faces, Kalu realized that eating alone was lonely, but eating together was a joyful feast!

MORAL OF THE STORY:

"Joy multiplies when we share our blessings with others."
